These model answers have been produced to aid students in wording their answers to longer questions that require Quality of Written Communication (QWC). Also, they give suggested ways to show calculations in numerical questions which require students to 'show your working.' The aim with these model answers is to use a writing style that is in keeping with the scientific literature; also it must be concise yet detailed enough to cover all the available marks. All suggested answers are shown below in this handwriting font.

These model answers have not been produced by AQA, or in conjunction with AQA. They do not constitute the only correct answers. They should only be used for revision purposes in conjunction with AQA's published past papers, mark schemes and examiners' reports, a link to which is provided above.

Question unit / topic	Approximate question wording* and marks available	Suggested Model Answer	Comments / Hints
AS Unit 1 / enzyme action	How does a glucose biosensor work, using the enzyme glucose oxidase? 3 marks	The enzyme glucose oxidase has an active site that will bind specifically to glucose. The tertiary structure of the enzyme creates a specific 3-D shape that forms a complementary fit to the glucose molecule, forming an enzyme-substrate complex. Only glucose will fit into that active site.	3 marks, 3 sentences. Lots of use of keywords (tertiary, active site, complementary, E-S complex) – if you know them, use them.
AS Unit 2 / mutations	How would a change in the base sequence of DNA result in an enzyme that does not function? 3 marks	Such a change could result in a change in the primary structure (amino acid sequence) of the resulting polypeptide. This would alter its tertiary structure because different hydrogen bonds would form on account of different R groups. The result would be that the enzyme's active site would be non-functional or possibly non-existent, so no substrate could bind to the enzyme and form an enzyme-substrate complex.	Don't repeat the question stem "Such a change ..."
