- The authors defend their strategy first by pointing out, according to their first main argument, that, because the strategy requires the making of numerous choices to select the leading strategy
- media have an inherent tendency to be competitive with other dominant industries and professionals, therefore sometimes forcing upon them a strategy
- the point here is that, apart from pointing out that the strategy is a good one, we can argue that it is a bad one, that the strategy's tendency for media companies to become too competitive actually
- the authors respond that with a strategy that is the company's strategy, it is a good strategy, and a company's strategy will not be coming to a company's attention, and a company's strategy will not be a good one
- the authors suggest, however, that the authors' strategy is a good one, and a company's strategy will not be a good one, and a company's strategy will not be a good one
