Texture H. Faridi,J.M. Faubion,2012-12-06 Cereal chemists are interested in rheology because the dough undergoes some type of deformation in every phase of the conversion of flour into baked products During mixing dough is subjected to extreme deformations many that exceed the rupture limit during fermentation the deformations are much smaller and therefore exhibit a different set of rheological properties during sheeting and molding deformations are at an intermediate level and finally during proofing and baking the dough is subjected to a range of deformations at varying temperatures Accordingly the application of rheological concepts to explain the behavior of dough seems a natural requirement of research on the interrelationships among flour constituents added ingredients process parameters and the required characteristics of the final baked product At any moment in the baking process the rheological behavior that is the nature of the deformation exhibited by a specific dough derives from the applied stress and how long the stress is maintained The resulting deformation may be simple such as pure viscous flow or elastic deformation and therefore easy to define precisely Moreover under some conditions of stress and time i e shear rate doughs behave as ideal materials and their behavior follows theory derived from fundamental concepts Under usual conditions encountered in baking however the rheological behavior is far from ideal shear rates vary widely and sample size and dimensions are ill defined Okra / Ocra Jana Horvat,Alma Bavdek,2009-01-01 The routes between the north Adriatic and the Apennine peninsula on the west and the Balkans and the central Danubian plains

on the east ran across Razdrto ever since ancient times In the late prehistory and in the early Roman era the pass of Razdrto was known under the name of Ocra as was the mountain above it Several Bronze age sites were discovered in the area of the Razdrto pass The posts in the Razdrto area from the end of the 2nd and first half of the 1st century BC Mandrga Preval differ from the other sites along the east Alpine routes as they were not spatially linked to any of the existing indigenous settlements and did not show any contact with the surroundings even with their small objects Most of the remains can be explained as traces of Roman passengers who stopped at Razdrto for a shorter period of time and not as remnants of a significant Roman settlement A gravel covered road was constructed across the Razdrto pass in the second half of the 1st century BC or in the Augustan period A roadside building was erected in the middle or late Augustan period and demolished in the mid 1st century AD The shift of transit from Razdrto to Hru ica Ad Pirum took place in the 1st century AD Post 1st century AD written sources no longer mention the road across Ocra and the archaeological remains dating after the mid 1st century AD are extremely modest at Razdrto
