JOURNEY TO THE END OF THE NIGHT

By
LOUIS-FERDINAND CÉLINE

This is not so much a book as an explosion. It has been more praised and more damned than anything since "Ulysses." It was not given the Prix Goncourt—and L'Académie Goncourt was nearly disrupted as a result. It was given the Prix Renaudot, and the sober-minded critics writhed in agony. The author has been compared to Rabelais, Montaigne, Flaubert, Zola, Anatole France, Steinberg, Huxley, Joyce, Hemingway, Dos Passos. The novel has been labelled "an insult to the reader" and called "the great literary discovery of the year." This literary tour took place in France, but the echoes reached all over Europe, and even made a noise in literary circles in America. Few foreign novels have been so well heralded before their publication in English.

It is the story of an underdog, of all underdogs, of the millions who go through life without hope, without raising their eyes, let alone, without looking into the light and escape from it to a hospital for the mentally deranged, suffering from fear and revolt. He is cured, sent to Africa to a concentration camp, sent to Africa to a concentration camp where he meets great blacks and white people who are dying of disease and death. He comes to America, a lonely, hunted man, and finally returns to France to complete his medical studies and open a practice among the poor of a Paris suburb. But the story is the best part of this book. In spite of a French style, it is written with beauty, power, and violence.
