then right and stepped sideways as the forward momentum of the Sulcrum's body continued past him and rammed into the glass window of the very store Kael had been standing in front of just minutes earlier. Shards of glass flew in all directions as the heavy metal body of the Sulcrum came to a halt in the middle of the now destroyed store display. The woman stared at the machine's head as it fell at Kael's feet. For a moment Kael stood with his arm still outstretched, blade extended outward, muscles tensed and bulging and his chest heaving as he worked to catch his breath. His eyes were glued to the woman. A second later he vaulted towards her, grabbed her by the hand and began running away from the storefront as fast as he could, drag his baggage behind him. She was small and couldn't keep up with him. Frustrated, he stopped. She immediately slammed into the back of him. "Ow! Damn you! Where are you taking me?" she yelled at him. "Away from here!" he yelled back. Without saying another word, he picked her up like she was a sack of potatoes, dumped her over his shoulder and ran down the street with her bouncing against his back. She wound her fingers into his shirt and held on tight to try and stop the mind-numbing bounce of her head. "I want to know where the hell you're taking me!" she shrieked, her words coming out in gasps as her stomach bounced painfully against his shoulder. Just as the last word was leaving her lips, the Sulcrum exploded in a massive ball of fire that sent bricks, glass, metal and parts of mannequins flying across the street. Kael kept running. The woman was too winded to scream when the explosion ripped through the store. Sirens howled in the distance, fire trucks and police cars already trying to make their way through the city streets to get to the odd scene that citizens had surely reported. Only minutes had passed since the Sulcrum's arrival, but there was enough chaos and damage on the street to make it look like a terrorist attack. Another explosion rocked the atmosphere, the sound reverberating off the tall buildings around them. The Sulcrum's head exploding just minutes after the body's self-destruction. Kael kept running. He had to get as far away from the scene as possible as fast as possible. He ran a mile before he finally stopped and put the woman down. Tears streaked her cheeks and her nose was red and wet from crying. She wobbled on her feet and shoved her long blonde hair out of her face to get a good look at him. Kael was barely panting from the long run. Running with her weight on his shoulder hadn't even winded him. His luminous green eyes stared down into her face, assessing her emotions and her physical state. "What the hell was that thing back there?" she demanded. "A Sulcrum," he answered succinctly. He reached for her hand. She snatched it out of his way so that he couldn't take hold of it. He frowned. "You must come with me. The hell you say! I don't have to go anywhere with you. You nearly got me killed back there." He reached for her hand again. Again she moved out of his grasp. "I want to know why the man in that armor was trying to kill you and why you are running with me. There's no time for that. We have to get as far away as possible as fast as possible. Every delay could mean the death of us. Why? And why we? Why do I have to go with you? What the hell is going on?" She ended in a near-scream of fury and frustration. "The Sulcrum is not a man. It's a machine. A very deadly one," Kael explained. The woman glanced at him nervously. She looked dazed, confused, and he could smell the terror thrumming through her bloodstream. "You've been imprinted," he stated. "What? What does that mean? It means that you are
