ABSTRACT This paper provides an extensive and thorough overview of the models and techniques utilized in the first and second stages of the typical information retrieval processing chain. Our discussion encompasses the current state-of-the-art models, covering a wide range of methods and approaches in the field of information retrieval. We delve into the historical development of these models, analyze the key advancements and breakthroughs, and address the challenges and limitations faced by researchers and practitioners in the domain. By offering a comprehensive understanding of the field, this survey is a valuable resource for researchers, practitioners, and newcomers to the information retrieval domain, fostering knowledge growth, innovation, and the development of novel ideas and techniques.

I. INTRODUCTION

CURRENTLY, Information Retrieval (IR) holds significant importance in people's daily lives due to its integration in various useful functions alike as internet browsing, question-answering systems, personal assistants, chatbots, and digital libraries. The primary objective is to recognize and retrieve information that is associated with the user's request. Since multiple records may be relevant, the results are frequently ranked according to their similarity score to the user's query. At the beginning of the IR field, traditional text retrieval systems predominantly rely on matching terms between documents and queries. However, these term-based retrieval systems have drawbacks, such as polysemy, synonymy, and lexical gaps, which can limit their effectiveness [1]. Recently, the field of Natural Language Processing (NLP) has undergone significant advancements due to the increased availability of large labeled datasets and enhanced computing power, which has allowed researchers to employ deep learning methods for various purposes. These techniques have been utilized to enhance traditional text retrieval systems and address the limitations of term-based retrieval techniques. However, applying these techniques requires substantial amounts of data and computational resources. As a result, researchers are constantly developing more advanced deep learning algorithms to meet these demands and achieve better results in NLP tasks [2]. With the use of these advanced deep learning algorithms, the performance of IR systems has been significantly improved, leading to more precise and efficient retrieval of information for end-users. Some of the advancements in deep learning techniques that have been employed in IR include neural network architectures such as convolutional neural networks [3] and recurrent neural networks [4], in addition to transfer learning and pre-training techniques [5]. These methods have improved text data representation and enhanced the IR system's understanding of natural language queries. Moreover, attention-based mechanisms like the Transformer architecture [6] have been implemented to enhance the capability of IR systems to focus on critical parts of the query and documents for matching purposes. Further, adopting pre-trained language models, such as BERT [5] and GPT-2 [7], has demonstrated the ability to improve IR systems performance by providing superior cognition of the semantics and context of natural language queries and documents. Similarly, researchers also concentrated on integrating external knowledge to enhance the relevance of the retrieved information. One approach is to incorporate knowledge graph embeddings [8] into the IR process, which can aid in linking the query and documents to relevant entities and concepts, thereby producing more accurate results. Moreover, the use of multi-modal information retrieval, which involves combining text, image, and audio information, has demonstrated the ability to enhance
