Abstract

Placed in an outside knee brace. On straightforward motion is as follows: start in the double knee hang. Remove one arm and the one responding outside leg. Be careful with your knee in this position.

The single, yet important, fact remains: when a person is arrested, the police are not to search the person's cell phone. The Supreme Court's decision in Riley v. California (2014) is a landmark case that established this principle. The Court held that the police must obtain a warrant before searching a person's cell phone, even if the phone is found on the person at the time of arrest. This decision was based on the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court reasoned that cell phones contain a vast amount of personal information, and searching them without a warrant would be a significant intrusion on a person's privacy. This decision is a crucial part of the legal framework governing law enforcement's access to digital data.
