

The Effects of Female Teacher Perceptions of Mathematics on the Quality of Teaching at The Basic School Level

Abstract

This study explored the influence of perceptions of Female Mathematics Teachers (FMTs) on their preparation, presentation and output of lessons delivered. Using a descriptive survey, 20 mixed primary schools were randomly selected for the study. Also, 11 Junior High Schools (JHSs) with Female Mathematics Teachers (FMTs) were purposively selected to participate in the study. All FMTs from the 31 basic schools selected were included in the study. The analysis of the data was based on percentage computations of responses from a questionnaire that was administered. The frequency of rejection or acceptance of items to a large extent represented the perceptions of FMTs in basic schools about their competence in lesson preparation and presentation. The findings show that FMTs at the primary and the JHS levels have very high confidence in themselves and felt they were equally as competent as their male colleagues. This fact notwithstanding, female teachers, teaching beyond the primary schools tend to avoid teaching mathematics. This is evident from the proportion of FMTs at the JHS and beyond in Ghana. The study recommends motivation, in-service training and scholarships for FMTs so as to equip more females to be able to teach Mathematics effectively at the basic level in Ghana.

1. Introduction

Teachers in public primary schools in Ghana adopt multiple subject teaching, whereby a teacher teaches all the subjects taught in the class or teaches more than one subject. By this arrangement, public primary school teachers in Ghana teach mathematics as well. According to the data from Ghana Education Service (2018), the proportion of female to male trained teachers at the basic school in Ghana was 45.8% female and 54.2% male for primary school whilst at the JHS 30.3% were females and 69.7% males. The proportion for the Northern Region of the country is 26% female and 74% male for primary and 19.2% female and 81.8% male for JHS. This is an improvement in the gender proportions compared to the records for 2015/2016 academic year which was 46.6% female and 53.4% male for primary and 30.5% female whilst 69.5% are male for JHS. This improvement in the proportion of female teachers means a lot in mathematics teaching in Ghanaian primary schools since all these female primary school teachers teach numeracy, arithmetic or mathematics.

Thompson and Asare-Danso (2016) enumerates that the preoccupation of the constructivist teacher, as they term it, is to motivate young learners to indulge or engage in activities that would sustain their interest in concepts being learned. The teacher is thus expected to adopt attitudes and practices that would engage young learners in practical tasks. After pupils have successfully engaged in these tasks, teachers are expected to adopt appropriate assessment skills to probe the level of success of the task and concepts learned. Basic school mathematics teachers are expected to exhibit these skills in order to build the requisite mathematics foundation for pupils. These professional practices required of teachers and the expected output from pupils especially in mathematics is not what the records of BECE and WASSCE show, as year on year achievements relative to other BECE and WASSCE subjects are poorer for mathematics.

Several interventions have been implemented over the years by both the Ghanaian government and non-governmental organisations to improve on achievement in mathematics and science at the basic level of education through practical or pupil-centred approaches. Some of these interventions by non-governmental organisations are; GES-JICA STM project (2002-2007), IBIS-ACE community teacher volunteer project (2012), UTTDBE programme (2005-2012), USAID e-learning project among others. All these projects were implemented in the Northern Region as well as other parts of the country.

The core areas of the mathematics curriculum at the basic level include numeracy, shape and space, algebra and data collection and handling. The GES Basic school syllabus for mathematics (2015) lists the core objectives of the JHS and primary schools' mathematics as follows;

The learner will:

- i. socialize,
- ii. adjust to and handle number words,
- iii. perform number operations,
- iv. make use of appropriate strategies of calculation.
