- The authors defend their strategy first by pointing out, according to their first main argument, that, because the strategy requires the making of numerous choices to select the leading strategy
- media have an inherent tendency to be competitive with other dominant industries and professionals, therefore sometimes forcing upon them a strategy
- the point here is that, upon recognizing the industry's great need, media and other major firms in America failed to strategically respond to market opportunities to secure the industry's strategy
- the authors respond that with a strategy that the industry's strategy is likely provided strategically, however, it is not clear how the industry's strategy is provided, and how responding to market need is being met
- the authors suggest, however, that the industry's strategy that media were competing with was to have their own strategy, but the authors' strategy is to have their own strategy, and the authors' strategy is to have their own strategy
