Lou Gehrig

Birth and childhood

Henry Louis ("Lou") Gehrig was born on June 19, 1903, to Heinrich and Christina Gehrig. Son of German immigrants living in Manhattan's East Harlem, Gehrig was the only one of four children to survive childhood. Gehrig's mother supported the family financially, as Gehrig's father was often sick and unable to work.

Education and entrance into baseball

When Gehrig was 17 years old and playing baseball for the New York School of Commerce, he played a game in Cubs Park (Wrigley Field) and gained unprecedented attention, as he appeared before 10,000 baseball fans. He graduated high school the following year, and went on to study at Columbia University. When he started college, he was advised by the football coach to play baseball under a false name in order to get in shape for football. He was discovered; because this action was illegal, he was banned from playing sports during his freshman year of college. During his sophomore year, after he was allowed to play sports again, he played as a fullback on Columbia's football team. He also pitched and played first base for the Columbia Nine. In 1923, Gehrig was signed to the Yankees with a $1500 bonus. He had to leave Columbia without graduating; however, he hit a .304 while playing for the minors, and was called up to the major league. He hit a .423 the following season.
