RECOGNITION Natalie Weakland, OhioLINK Electronic Theses and Dissertations Center, 2013 The implementation and selection of sight word instruction in classrooms has changed throughout the years as educators seek to find the most effective and student friendly ways to teach sight word recognition Students ability to automatically and accurately read sight words plays a key role in the areas of fluency and comprehension Many teachers use a rote memorization method to teach these words however rote memorization is not the only way to provide effective sight word instruction The use of games based instruction for educational purposes in the classroom is an area of interest amongst both educators and researchers Yet research concerning rote memorization and games based methods for sight word instruction is a scantily explored field of study This research study used a single subject multi element design with alternating treatments research design to examine the effectiveness of two strategies for teaching new sight words to students performing below grade level in sight word recognition and to determine student preferences for each condition Five first grade participants were selected to receive sight word instruction via a modified rote memorization methodology called Incremental Rehearsal mIR and a games based instruction model using the game Memory Pre and post assessment data revealed that both methods were effective for teaching sight words Additionally no patterns were found concerning the participants preferences for either of the sight word learning methods
