Macroeconomic Issues and Policies

Inflation

Concept of Inflation

In general, inflation means the increase in general level of prices. Due to the increase in general price level (GPL), the value or purchasing power of money declines.

Some definitions:

Crowther: Inflation means a state in which the value of money is falling, i.e. prices are rising.

Coulbourne: Inflation is too much money chasing too few goods.

Milton Friedman: Inflation is always and everywhere a monetary phenomenon. [Monetarist's View]

J.M. Keynes: Inflation is the result of excess demand over available supply of output after full employment. (He calls it as real or true inflation). [Keynesian View]

There are basically three features of inflation:

- a. Inflation is the real increase in prices.
- b. Inflation is not a temporary fluctuation in price, but it is a sustained and appreciable increase in prices.
- c. Inflation means the increase in GPL, not the increase in individual prices.

Thus, in ordinary sense, inflation means high price. In reality high price does not show the existence of inflation. Hence, inflation implies a persistent and appreciable rise in the GPL.

Types of Inflation

There are different types of inflation. The major types of inflation are explained below:

I. On the Basis of Speed or Rate of Change in Price

i. Creeping inflation

This is the mildest type of inflation. In this situation, prices rise within a range of 20% per decade or two percent per annum.

ii. Walking inflation

This is the situation when prices rise by more than from 20% and within a range of 40-50% over a decade. It is a warning signal to the economy.

iii. Running inflation

In this situation, prices rise rapidly. Running inflation may record more than 100% rise in prices over a decade or 10% per annum.
