- The authors defend their strategy first by pointing out, according to their first main argument, that, because the strategy requires the making of numerous choices to select the leading strategy
- media have an inherent tendency to be competitive with other dominant industries and professionals, therefore sometimes forcing unjust monopolies
- the point that is made, about monopolizing the industry's global reach, means that global reach, that is, the ability to reach other countries, is not necessarily leading to market monopolization because the reach may increase
- the authors defend their claim by providing evidence that, according to their strategy, provided technology, business, and social networking will be increasing exponentially, and that technology will continue to grow and spread
- the authors suggest, however, that, although technology will continue to grow, technology will not be able to reach other countries that currently do not have access to the global market or technology, and that is why
