These studies on social capital, and particularly social norms, all fit the idea that the primary (and sometimes the only) mechanism by which individuals in a group decide to engage in prosocial behavior is through the social norms of the group. The social norms are the set of patterns of repeated and generalized behaviors of the group that members of the group learn to follow. The social norms, and the norms of the group, are the primary mechanism by which individuals in a group decide to engage in prosocial behavior.

The algorithm used can be used in a number of ways, and is described in detail below. The above description is intended to be a high-level overview of the algorithm, and is not intended to be a detailed description of the algorithm. The algorithm is described in detail in the following sections.
