By contrast, most job seekers who are perceived as being honest are also very honest people themselves. In a recent survey, I asked job seekers who made it to the top of the search company's list of job seekers to describe their traits. When asked what they thought employers most valued, 60 percent of the respondents listed honesty as the most important trait.

These methods usually are used simply to get another opinion. Because of government rules, we usually take most of a company's financial statements back to the company and let them determine what to do. But I have seen a few cases where the company wanted to know what we thought. In those cases, we usually would not say anything, but I have seen a few cases where we would say something. In those cases, we usually would say that we thought the company was doing well, but we would not say anything about the company's financial statements. In those cases, we usually would say that we thought the company was doing well, but we would not say anything about the company's financial statements.

John and Michael were in the kitchen, talking, when I saw Michael enter the living room toward God, who was reclining in a chair, and never looked toward him. I followed him back to God's bedroom, and passed a picture of God's head on the wall, gazing thoughtfully, never turning further against the wall.

"What was that?" she asked, looking at him again.

"Sitting on the porch, I was looking at the stars, and I was thinking about the future. I was thinking about the future."
