Abstract

- The primary reason why it is strategic first to convert the company's work into more open positions (as opposed to directly expanding the existing organization) is that it allows change to spread more rapidly across the business because all the company's other open positions (including all subcontracted employees) continue to follow the original organizational design.
- The second reason is strategic, based on recognizing that the company's original work, design and organizational structure all evolved together. When the organization expands, the original organizational structure is more likely to remain a strategy.
- The third is important strategically, particularly now that companies are using a variety of practices, including a variety of subcontracting, with each of existing employees as well as new employees. This new relationship structure will continue to grow.
- The overall impact, particularly during business downturns that require more employees, will not be to force each firm to accept the subcontracting arrangement, but to force each firm to accept the subcontracting arrangement.
