These authors have suggested that, by increasing water availability over its range throughout the watershed, the water management could be considered the ideal intervention. However, since increased water availability often encourages nonpoint-source pollution that could offset any gains in water quality, this intervention may prove counterproductive. In addition, building water storage facilities may itself contribute to the local water use that has increased. Finally, any water-related intervention proposed for adoption is greatest if it gets communitywide support (Barnett 2000).

The above three activities are interconnected and mutually reinforcing activities intended to strengthen the economy.
