Bio-inspired Algorithms for the Vehicle Routing Problem Francisco Baptista Pereira, Jorge Tavares, 2008-09-10 The vehicle routing problem VRP is one of the most famous combinatorial optimization problems In simple terms the goal is to determine a set of routes with overall minimum cost that can satisfy several geographical scattered demands A fleet of vehicles located in one or more depots is available to fulfill the requests A large number of variants exist adding different constraints to the original definition Some examples are related to the number of depots the ordering for visiting the customers or to time windows specifying a desirable period to arrive to a given location The original version of this problem was proposed by Dantzig and Ramser in 1959 1 In their seminal paper the authors address the calculation of a set of optimal routes for a fleet of gasoline delivery trucks Since then the VRP has attracted the attention of a large number of researchers A considerable part of its success is a consequence of its practical interest as it resembles many real world problems faced everyday by distribution and transportation companies just to mention a few applications areas In this context the development of efficient optimization techniques is crucial They are able to provide new and enhanced solutions to logistic operations and may therefore lead to a substantial reduction in costs for companies Additionally and from a research oriented perspective the VRP is a challenging NP hard problem providing excellent benchmarks to assess the efficiency of new global optimization algorithms
