

I grew up in the eighties right across the street from a school for the developmentally disabled. My brother and I loved to dumpster dive, always out of curiosity rather than necessity. The excitement of exploration was balanced with an equally strong sense of obligation to save valuable items from being thrown away. This sense wasn't merely for the sake of being environmental. It was for the sake of the object, and the potential for its resurrection, revitalization, and rebirth.

Our favorite spot was the cluster of dumpsters behind the school. There were a few times we discovered several dumpsters full of hardbound books. We couldn't believe anyone would throw the books away, and we would gather bookloads to take home to our attic library. They may have been out of date, or useless to us specifically, but we would take them for the titles, the pictures, and often for the actual stories, or sometimes just because it was a book. We had a massive attic library due to our diving.

Encyclopedias were like swimming pools to us. We didn't have our own set but we always knew someone who did. We could politely negotiate a quick swim into the neighbor's set or, if we needed a longer swim, we could walk to the library downtown. At the library we could get refreshed and gather interesting ideas from deep within the waves.

The situation has changed.

The book is no longer the king of the information ecosystem. We can now access almost anything instantly online, and bound encyclopedias have become large land mammals that can't compete with the newer species. They have collapsed and they can't go on. Do we feed from the carcass? Ideas, like proteins, are valuable and shouldn't go to waste. They should be consumed by monsters. Or, do we treat them through taxidermy to preserve them in an inanimate state for future generations to view in museums?

I eat books. I started carving into them around the year 2000. I was work-
