

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of workers. The study included 600 male employees from a large manufacturing company who had been employed for at least one year. They were divided into three groups based on their job type: manual laborers, machine operators, and office workers. Data were collected through self-reported questionnaires about symptoms such as pain, numbness, and tingling in the hands, wrists, arms, shoulders, neck, back, and legs. Results showed that manual laborers reported significantly higher rates of musculoskeletal disorders compared to machine operators and office workers. Machine operators also reported higher rates than office workers. These findings suggest that physical demands of work play a significant role in the development of musculoskeletal disorders.
