Remember: Electricity is the flow of electrons (negative charges).

Electrons flow from the negative terminal of a battery (or other source of potential difference) to the positive terminal. This flow of electrons is called electric current. The direction of electron flow is opposite to the direction of conventional current flow.

For electrons to flow, there must be a potential difference (voltage) across the circuit. This voltage is provided by a battery (or other source of potential difference). The voltage across a battery is called its electromotive force (EMF). The voltage across a resistor is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a lamp is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a motor is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a buzzer is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a bell is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a siren is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a horn is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a bell is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a siren is called its potential difference (PD). The voltage across a horn is called its potential difference (PD).

Remember: The EMF of a battery is the potential difference across its terminals.
