was applied between two electrodes in an evacuated tube. The cathode ray emitted rays, which produced a glow when they struck the glass behind the anode. By studying the properties of these rays, he concluded that the rays are made up of negatively charged particles which he called electrons. Thomson demonstrated that atoms are not indivisible. They contain electrons which are negatively charged and are located in the cathode.

Thomson proposed his model of an atom in 1903. According to this model, an atom is a sphere of uniform positive charge, which contains negatively charged electrons. This is known as the plum pudding model. The positive charge is distributed uniformly throughout the atom, and the electrons are embedded in it. As the whole atom is electrically neutral, the total positive charge must be equal and opposite to the total negative charge of the electrons.
