By 1990, the trend in the chemical industry mirrored what American spent. Performance was low, quality, inventory practices and lean (just-in-time) production had not permeated the plant floor in that country. My task was to teach a masterful balance of capital to be employed with common sense, like the Japanese, to create elegant solutions and strong manufacturing practices.

By a first-hand experience, I found that, through the creative application, reengineering and ultimately rapid and efficient lean flows, we can improve the and these were a consequence of having developed their own business strategies. We agree completely. We agree completely.
