

The first of the two main types of engine is the internal combustion engine. This is the most common type of engine and is used in most vehicles. It works by burning fuel inside the engine cylinder, which causes the piston to move up and down. This movement is converted into rotational motion by the crankshaft.

The second type of engine is the external combustion engine. This is less common than the internal combustion engine and is used in some industrial applications. It works by burning fuel outside the engine cylinder, which heats a fluid that then turns the engine.

12.10.10 - Internal Combustion Engine

The internal combustion engine is the most common type of engine and is used in most vehicles. It works by burning fuel inside the engine cylinder, which causes the piston to move up and down. This movement is converted into rotational motion by the crankshaft.
