Great Depression urbanization waves and postwar development sanitation was both a cause and a consequence of the built environment Bin Kasim characterizes this complex relationship between sanitation and urban growth over time as the saniscape The saniscape is the confluence of public health planning interventions and various urban constituencies and includes an array of influences like colonial expertise and African industry which shaped the two cities regardless of their power dynamics and land tenure Attention to the saniscape validates how Africans called out colonial discrimination and inefficiencies to intervene and shape cities This volume highlights the shared histories of Accra and Nairobi and upends conventional narratives that attach too much difference to non settler and settler colonialism Healthy City Harvests
