

PLAY & EXPLORE

Add colored paper faces and groups eyes to give personality to your automata.

Things might not work as expected. You may have to bend and re-bend wires, adjust the placement and angles of the arms, and closely observe the motions of your machine.

Experiment
With adding multiple characters to your automata, how can you bend the wire so that all have to do their own dance?

What happens if the string gets a bigger or smaller? By making the string shorter or longer and see whether anything changes. Consider adding an extra string so it moves smoother.

If you connect your character to the moving elements with wire, springs or other moving materials, you can create more interesting movement.

GOING DEEPER

keep cranking!

After building an automata with a crank slider, you can imagine the possibilities of multiple animated characters moving up and down and around.

Light Play

Attach colorful pieces of soda bottles or food containers, bubble wrap, mirrors, or plastic crystals to the moving pieces. Position your machine in front of a light and behind a white screen and watch the light play.

Storytelling

Ryoko Matsumoto is a museum educator who helped develop this project. She says, "When you are tinkering with cranky contraptions, you are exploring motion, mechanism, and storytelling."

Sound Machine

Notice how the moving element goes back and forth. Attach a jingle bell and make it ring. How else can you use an automata's motion to make noise?

Tinkering Inspiration SERIOUSLY PLAYFUL

Automata makers are artists, engineers, and tinkers. Keith Newstead used wood, wire, and found materials to build crank-powered machines like this elephant, made from an old detergent bottle.

Automata makers explore mechanical ideas like levers, cranks, gears, and pulleys. But that doesn't stop them from thinking of unexpected ways to use their materials. When you build automata with recycled materials, use your imagination. Engineer your own fun and silly ways to give cardboard boxes, plastic containers, and scrap wood new life.
