RESEARCHERS ARE REPORTING THAT the use of a new type of computerized decision support system (DSS) can help managers make better decisions. The system, called "Decision Support System for the Management of the Enterprise" (DSSME), was developed by researchers at the University of California, Berkeley. It is designed to help managers make decisions about the allocation of resources, such as money and personnel, across different departments and projects. The system uses a variety of data, including financial statements, budgets, and historical performance data, to help managers make more informed decisions. The researchers claim that the system can help managers make decisions more quickly and accurately than traditional methods. They also claim that the system can help managers identify potential problems and opportunities before they become major issues. The system is currently being used by several large corporations, and the researchers are planning to continue to develop and improve it.
