

EXPERIMENT 1

Determination of percentage composition of liquid mixtures from surface tension measurements

Objectives: To determine the surface tension of liquid mixtures and to determine the percentage composition of liquid mixtures from surface tension measurements.

The surface tension of a liquid is a property which is characteristic of the liquid and is independent of the surface area. It is a measure of the cohesive forces between the molecules of the liquid.

The surface tension of a liquid can be measured by a number of methods. One of the most common methods is the capillary rise method. In this method, a glass tube of known diameter is partially immersed in the liquid. The liquid rises in the tube to a certain height. This height is a measure of the surface tension of the liquid.

The surface tension of a liquid can also be measured by the drop weight method. In this method, a known volume of liquid is allowed to fall from a glass plate. The weight of the drop is a measure of the surface tension of the liquid.

The surface tension of a liquid can also be measured by the ring method. In this method, a ring of known circumference is partially immersed in the liquid. The force required to pull the ring out of the liquid is a measure of the surface tension of the liquid.

The surface tension of a liquid can also be measured by the bubble method. In this method, a bubble of known radius is formed in the liquid. The pressure inside the bubble is a measure of the surface tension of the liquid.
