PROTECT OUR CORAL REEFS

Coral reefs serve more purpose beyond just being a destination for scuba-divers. They not only house families of fish, 131 and they also act as a form of protection for more vulnerable fish who need to hide from the 132 ocean's many predators. When it comes to environmental stability, coral reefs help with water filtration and support the growth of fish populations. 133 However, coral reefs support communities of fish by providing a 134 multitude of resources from shelter to food.

Coral reefs are just as important to the human environment as 135 it is to the ocean's wildlife. Without the existence of these colorful ocean rocks, many natural and essential processes would not occur. For example, coral reefs protect shorelines 136 of the brutal effects of waves and the ocean's aggressive storms. The presence of coral reefs near shorelines helps to prevent erosion by weakening strong waves before they reach land.
