

Natural Selection and Evolution

Questions:

1. Populations can have variety despite being made up of the same species. If a population has different expressed traits, this can be due to different inherited alleles. The frogs below are the same species, but they have different shades of green based on their inherited alleles. In a particular environment, lighter green frogs are easier to see by predators. Explain how natural selection could lead to a change in allele frequency.

If, let's say, the lighter green frogs get eaten so much because the predator sees them, there will be not many green frogs, and at that point, not many lighter green recessive alleles.

2. Natural selection is an example of a mechanism of evolution. Does this mechanism produce a change in individuals or populations? Explain!

The change produced by natural selection happens in populations because there are both, let's say, light and dark green frogs in a population and the light ones get eaten. So the allele change happens in an entire population.

3. A major point of understanding natural selection is that not all organisms in a population get to reproduce. Consider the term fitness as used in biology. How does this term relate to natural selection?

Natural selection, the ability to survive, affects the ability to reproduce, which is fitness. If you are dead, then you can't reproduce.
