

Fig -7: Shortest path planning scenario in dynamic environment

Fig.7 shows the experimental set up of path planning algorithm in known dynamic environment, where in a third obstacle is also placed in the grid. During its course to the goal, the mobile robot detects the third obstacle then it will localize, itself and obstacles location. This information is communicated to the central station. The central station will run the shortest path planning algorithm with the updated information and this will make the mobile robot traverse through the shortest path to the goal.

CONCLUSIONS

Path planning in known environment is designed and implemented. The robot could navigate to the target through shortest path. It was found that there are deviations from robot's actual path from the desired path. This may be due to the wheel slippage, position sensor errors, sensory charge fluctuation and difference in friction between wheel and path. This can be avoided using Simultaneous Localization And Mapping techniques like Extended Kalman Filter, Particle Filter etc. The deviation from the path can be predicted using probabilistic techniques and it can be corrected accordingly.
