Consumer Fraud Division Arizona. Attorney General's Office. Division of Consumer Fraud, 1967 Financial Fraud and Abuse , Consumer Fraud Jane G. Schubert, Robert E. Krug, Andrew M. Rose, 1979 Consumer Psychology and the Problem of Fine Print Fraud Meirav Furth-Matzkin, 2019 This Article investigates how laypeople respond to consumer contracts that are formed as a result of fraud Across four studies we show that contrary to the prevailing wisdom in contract law scholarship fine print is not simply white noise Rather it has a significant and detrimental effect on lay consumers We demonstrate that clauses that consumers neglect to read ex ante at the time of signing have a significant psychological effect ex post when consumers discover that they were deceived about the terms of the transaction Consumers who would otherwise complain about being cheated are demoralized by contractual fine print and consequently decline to seek redress This is because they erroneously assume that all contracts even contracts induced by fraud are binding Our studies presented participants with cases in which a seller induces a consumer to buy a product or service by making a false representation The false representation is directly contradicted by the written terms of the contract which the consumer

signs without reading Our findings reveal that laypeople unlike legally trained individuals mistakenly believe that such agreements are consented to and will be enforced as written despite the seller's material deception Importantly the presence of fine print discourages consumers from wanting to take legal action initiate a complaint or damage the firm's reputation by telling others what happened even when the contract contradicts what they were told At the same time the fact that the seller lied makes little difference to laypeople's intuitions about whether the contract will be or should be enforced as written Finally we show that informing consumers about Anti Deception Consumer Protection Laws alters their perceptions about the legal and moral status of contracts induced by fraud although such information does not completely counteract their formalistic intuition that whatever the contract says is the final word The implications of our study we argue are that prevailing methods for addressing deceptive business practices are inadequate because they fail to take account of consumer psychology

Consumer Fraud Michigan. Consumer Protection Division, Consumer Fraud Jean M. Ward, Brenda L. Schneider, Elizabeth A. Smith, Waterford School District (Mich.). Department of Community Education, 1976

A License to Deceive Debra Pogrud Stark, Jessica M. Choplin, 2009 Are consumers foolish or negligent when they trust what salespersons falsely tell them rather than read all of the terms of the contracts they sign Should consumers be barred from bringing a fraud action on the ground that they have not reasonably relied upon such false statements or deceptive conduct when the form contract they sign states that they have not so relied Currently seven states courts have interpreted their consumer fraud statutes to require reasonable reliance and three quarters of the states courts impose this requirement for a common law action for fraud Some courts have also ruled that the presence of a no reliance type clause bars a consumer from being able to raise the alleged false statement or deceptive conduct The attached article A License to Deceive Enforcing Contractual Myths Despite Consumer Psychological Realities provides an interdisciplinary analysis of this important aspect of consumer fraud law The article proposes law reforms based upon the results of our fraud simulation study reading contracts survey and an analysis of the cognitive and social psychological reasons why consumers trust what salespersons tell them rather than read all of the contract terms In our survey of consumers we found that on average 67% of the consumers reported that they failed to read all of the terms of the contracts they signed among the six different categories of consumer transactions surveyed agreements relating to computer software rolling contracts car rentals apartment leases home purchase and home loans As detailed in the article the primary reasons why consumers rely upon what the salesperson tells them and fail to carefully read and understand all of the terms of the contracts they sign are due to cognitive barriers such as i visual and comprehension challenges based upon the manner in which many form contracts are drafted ii analytic deficiencies based upon schema deficits iii positive confirmation biases iv inability to imagine possible negative outcomes i e the availability heuristic v default assumptions and v sunk cost effects The article also explores some of the social psychological reasons why consumers fail to read the contracts they sign including i misplaced trust in the defrauders due to a variety of factors which creates a strong motivation to trust which is exacerbated when the consumer is of a lower socio economic status ii social norms not to read contracts in certain contexts and a concomitant social value to trust and iii a perceived and often real inability to negotiate the terms of the contract In light of these cognitive and social psychological barriers to reading and understanding all of the terms of the form contracts that consumers sign we contend that courts are enforcing a contractual myth and creating a license to deceive when they enforce no reliance type clauses in contracts when in fact many consumers do in fact rely upon such statements in making the decision to purchase the product or service Ninety percent of the public we surveyed reported that they expect that the terms of the contracts they sign will be consistent with the salesperson's statements and eighty percent reported that if there is an inconsistency they think the company should honor the statements made by the salespeople when the consumer has not read the terms of the agreement While promoting certainty of contractual obligations is a legitimate goal and the enforceability of no reliance type clauses through the reasonable reliance requirement is sensible under certain conditions in transactions between sophisticated companies this article contends that based upon our empirical data it is not sound policy to make it a bar to a consumer bringing a common law fraud action or a statutory fraud action the consumer would of course still have the burden to prove that the parol false statement or deceptive conduct took place This article comprehensively addresses an important aspect of consumer fraud among the fifty states and provides very important data relative to the issue of consumer protection in general and consumer fraud in particular

Consumer Scams in Australia Russell G. Smith, 2007 As part of a global effort to fight mass marketed consumer frauds and scams consumer protection agencies in a number of western countries participate in a month of fraud prevention activities each year to raise awareness of the problem and provide advice to consumers on how to avoid being victimised An initiative of the International Consumer Protection and Enforcement Network in 2000 the campaign is joined by more countries each year and in March 2006 some 33 countries participated In Australia and New Zealand 18 government agencies comprise the Australasian Consumer Fraud Taskforce established in March 2005 to support the network's activities The key message to consumers in 2006 was when a scam comes calling delete it hang up destroy it This emphasised the fact that consumers are their own best defence against scams and should always err on the side of caution when conducting business transactions This paper presents the results of a pilot study undertaken during March 2006 in which 103 of the 121 consumers who contacted the ACCC's national hotline agreed to provide information on their experiences of consumer fraud over the preceding year Although the results are not indicative of consumer fraud throughout Australia some preliminary findings are of interest particularly as there has been limited statistical data to inform the development of policy in this area to date
